Available in Lightroom and Photoshop Lightroom is an alternative to Photoshop. However, you have to own a copy of Photoshop to have access to its features. In Lightroom, which is available for Mac and Windows, you can view and work with your images, and you can manage the layers with which you work. You also manage the copyright information. You can create a great deal of metadata and fine-tune a finished image in the metadata panel. Using the metadata panel, you can easily rename your images and order them. And you can create groups for related images, all in one panel. Unlike Lightroom, you can export your images out of Lightroom, but not into Photoshop. For more information about Lightroom, see the next section.

You've been hearing a lot about the food safety issue in recent days. NBC and ABC News programs have aired segments on food-related illnesses from contaminated chicken and imported fruits. The FDA has held several news conferences, sometimes off camera, to describe problems in the meat packing and food transportation industries. As you might imagine, the issue has sparked a lot of political debate about food safety. Just last week, for example, Senator Jeff Sessions, one of the nation's most conservative and hard-edged political figures, provided comments about the problem for Food and Drug Administration employees during a meeting with them. Sessions called the agency "something of a black box," a phrase that suggests government officials are secretive. "What we don't know is scary," Sessions said. The latest headlines about the riskiness of our food supply are now bringing out the foods industry's critics. The industry, remember, is the one that produces food. It has a lot at stake in the safety of the product and its profits. Amid all the political debate, it's worth noting that most foodborne illnesses, as we used to call them, are caused by contaminated food, not by contaminated food workers. More than 2 million of these illnesses occur every year, but half of those cases, some 950,000, are food-related. And about 300 people die from foodborne illnesses annually. What about all those tainted beef products? Their source of contamination is the food plant, not the people handling them. So, should we be concerned about these dirty-meat producers? In fact, we should be concerned about them. But we're seeing that they are often major employers, and a large proportion of them operate legally and responsibly in markets across the U.S. They pay taxes, they pay payroll, they pay state and local taxes and, until very recently, they provided good, safe jobs. But reports of dirty meat plants and meat distributors make headlines and affect public perception. And that's a problem. As a result, business owners hesitate to operate clean food plants, while others become more aggressive about the risks they are willing to take. In the end, are we creating an unsafe food supply in this country? I doubt it. We have excellent food safety laws, procedures and enforcement. Let's just start with the Food Safety Modernization Act,

Over the past year, the nation's largest meat processor has told its customers it hasn't used offal — or offal byproducts — for hamburger and sausage. On March 12, Cargill completed a new 8-million-square-foot plant in Colfax, Wash., that will pump out 15 million pounds of processed meat a year. In the same announcement, the facility said it would be spending nearly $500 million on meat-processing equipment, many of which come from South Korea and, newly, Vietnam. Construction of that large facility is the culmination of several years of growth.

Between 2006 and 2011, Cargill increased its slaughter and processing capacity in the United States by more than 50 percent. Over the same period, Cargill nearly
